Twenty-second Sunday in Ordinary Time Year C Twelfth Sunday after Pentecost (Proper 17)

Lectionary citations:

Jeremiah 2:4-13 with Psalm 81:1, 10-16 or Sirach 10:12-18 with Psalm 112 Hebrews 13:1-8, 15-16
Luke 14:1, 7-14

On an occasion I was leading a workshop on the story Moses and the Burning Bush. I asked the group to consider two questions. What is burning in you that is consuming you? And, what is burning in you that is sustaining you? A black man in the audience pushed back against the frame of the questions arguing that some people must carry unfair and unsustainable burdens in the struggle for justice and inclusion while others get choices on whether to be involved or not. I was shocked and realised that even the way I had shaped these questions revealed the privilege I enjoy. I had the power to choose to remain silent in the face of injustice. Where do you see unearned privilege at work in your world today? Are you aware of any privilege you benefit from but didn't work for? Who or what created and sustains this situation?

Desmond Tutu, 21st century
 "A person with ubuntu is open and available to others, affirming of others, does not feel threatened that others are able and good, for he or she has a proper self-assurance that comes from knowing that he or she belongs in a greater whole and is diminished when others are humiliated or diminished, when others are tortured or oppressed."

Brené Brown, 21st century
 "Those who have a strong sense of love and belonging have the courage to be imperfect."

Jesse Brown, 21st century "Eating, and hospitality in general, is a communion, and any meal worth attending by yourself is improved by the multiples of those with whom it is shared."

Letty M. Russell, 20th century "Hospitality is the practice of God's welcome by reaching across difference to participate in God's actions bringing justice and healing to our world in crisis."

Did someone go through our world and change the price tags that determine what we value? And what grounds us? It feels that way to me. In conversations and email, I hear two consistent themes; depletion (from overload, distraction and hurry) and disconnect (diminished trust from fear and projection). The cacophony in our world is loud. And if we're at all insecure about our status, we are susceptible to (blinded by) public opinion, social media pressure and mob mentality. Bluntly, we lose our way. Okay, I'll personalize this; I lose my way. And here's how I know; when I demean, exclude, diminish, withhold mercy or withhold empathy (from others or myself) I lose my way. So. Here's the deal: We need to pause. It is necessary to "quiet the internal noise," in order to hear the gentle lessons of the heart and stories about sufficiency, not scarcity.

In a national magazine, an ad for the Humane Society minced no words. Above an adorable puppy and kitten, the ad read, "It's who owns them that makes them important." Our wellbeing, is about who or what, owns us. The good news is this; when we lose our way, our authentic self is not gone. It's just been unembraced, and marginalized. There is a bad car accident on a busy street. A woman, from one of the vehicles, lay in the street, in need of medical assistance. A young woman bends over the body. A man rushes over. "Move away please," he tells the woman. "I've had CPR training. Let me handle this." He pulls out his training manual. After a minute, the young woman taps him on the shoulder and says, "When you get to the part about calling a doctor, I'm already here." That'll preach. In Parker Palmer's words, "Our deepest calling is to grow into our own authentic selfhood. As we do so, we will find our path of authentic service in the world." So. Let us wade in, returning to the truth of who we are (you know, the one already here), and to the light we can spill.

To live fully into the self I've been given, an authentic self not gummed up with so many limiting stories.

And Lord, it took me back to something that I'd lost Somewhere, somehow along the way.

Kris Kristofferson, Sunday Morning Coming Down

Mother Teresa once told a roomful of lepers how much God loved them. She told them that they are "a gift to the rest of us."

Interrupting her, an old leper raises his hand, and she calls on him. "Could you repeat that again?" he asks. "It did me good. So, would you mind; just saying it again."

Yes please. Just say it again.

I love the title of Tim O'Brien's book, The Things They Carried (about a group of soldiers in Vietnam). The title fits what we're asking today, What do we carry as reminders in order to sustain, replenish and nourish, and not lose our way?

On my desk is a medicine pouch. A gift from a Native American friend. When the Shawnee and Chippewa (and other early people) went on hunts or vision quests or long journeys, each traveler would carry in a small rawhide pouch various tokens of spiritual power--perhaps a feather, a bit of fur, a claw, a carved root, a pinch of tobacco, a pebble or a shell.
These were not simply magical charms; they were reminders of the energies that sustain all of life. By gathering these talismans into a medicine pouch, the hunter, traveler, or visionary seeker was recollecting the sources of healing and bounty and beauty.

All of it marinated, by the way, in an elixir of humor. Because I do know this; if my pouch is filled with a need for control and answers, I lose lightheartedness, and can easily be seized with frustration, fear, panic, rage, despair, depression and exasperation. (You get the picture?) Let's just call it heatstroke of the heart.

But what if? What if... the "tokens" in that pouch are not a magic wand to undo life, but instead, the power and the freedom to embrace the life we have been given and to create life for those around us?

What if... wired to care, we see in this life, this day, even in the very muddle of the ordinary, even in the very chaos, the permission to trust our sufficiency, embrace our wounds as they become sacred wounds, and become places of empathy, compassion, healing? Because grace is alive and well.

"Spirituality means waking up." (Anthony de Mello reminds us.) To the power of the present moment. There is no doubt that waking up isn't always cheerful. Or easy. It is, however, worth it.

Because wholehearted people live present, susceptible to tenderness and mercy, human touch and healing.

Yes please, Just say it again.

Here's why my medicine pouch resonates; I need something visceral, incarnational, liturgical. I am, literally, grounded.

We cut ourselves little slack.

Because we need invitations to marinate in grace. To remember that the sacred is close by. To see life in fullness, hopefulness, wonder, gratitude, beauty, silence, prayer, connection and sufficiency. And from this marinade of grace, we embrace our humanity and all that enriches it; empathy, tenderness, inclusion, forgiveness. We let ourselves spill the light we receive, we give, offer, hold, touch, care, soothe, empathize and invite sanctuary.

What's in your medicine pouch this week?

I'm off to the airport later this evening, to Cincinnati, to spend the week with the good people at Franciscan Media.
We're recording the audio book for This Is the Life: Mindfulness, Finding Grace, and the Power of the Present Moment. It's my new book, due out October 14. I'm honored to work with them.
Stay tuned. (There's a big smile on my face in case you couldn't tell.)

This afternoon I'm in the garden. Tomatoes off the vine and cucumbers and onions, for a wee salad with lunch.
It's back to school week for many. Which means respite for parents.

Quote for your week...

Do not be dismayed by the brokenness of the world. All things break. And all things can be mended. Not with time, as they say, but with intention. So go. Love intentionally, extravagantly, unconditionally. The broken world waits in darkness for the light that is you.
